IBM MQ v9.4 Administrator - Professional Sample Questions (Q79-Q84):

NEW QUESTION # 79

When administrators configure queue sharing groups in IBM MQ on z/OS, what unique benefit do these groups provide in terms of workload and message availability compared to stand-alone queue managers?

- A. They replicate queues only in memory for faster performance
- B. They allow queues to be accessed simultaneously by multiple queue managers in the group
- C. They restrict queue access to one system at a time for safety
- D. They eliminate the need for security and access control mechanisms

Answer: B

Explanation:

Queue sharing groups enable multiple queue managers to share queues in a coupling facility, ensuring higher availability and workload distribution across systems.

NEW QUESTION # 80

When designing a high-volume messaging system where large files must be split into smaller units for transfer and then reassembled by the receiver, which IBM MQ feature provides this functionality to ensure complete delivery without manual intervention?

- A. Queue Partitioning
- B. Distributed Batch Splitting
- C. Multi-Queue Aggregation
- D. Message Segmentation and Grouping

Answer: D

Explanation:

Message Segmentation and Grouping allows IBM MQ to divide large messages into smaller pieces for transfer and reassemble them at the destination, ensuring integrity of large data.

NEW QUESTION # 81

When deploying IBM MQ in a geographically distributed environment with multiple data centers, which approach guarantees message delivery continuity in the event of a full data center outage while maintaining message order and integrity?

- A. Non-persistent messaging with load balancing across sites
- B. Deploying temporary queues and relying on application-level retries
- C. Using a single queue manager per site with manual backup and restore procedures
- D. Using clustered queue managers with mirrored persistent storage and failover routing

Answer: D

Explanation:

Clustered queue managers with mirrored persistent storage and failover routing provide continuity, ensure message order, and maintain integrity across multiple locations.

NEW QUESTION # 82

Which IBM MQ feature allows applications to be notified automatically when a specific condition occurs on a queue, such as the arrival of a new message, so that resources are not wasted in constant polling?

- A. Queue Browsing
- B. Asynchronous Consumers
- C. Trigger Monitors
- D. Channel Initiators

Answer: C

Explanation:

Trigger Monitors enable event-driven processing by starting an application automatically when messages arrive, removing the need for continuous polling of queues.

NEW QUESTION # 83

Which approach correctly explains the use of IBM MQ message grouping in scenarios where large datasets are split into multiple messages, including how message sequence, grouping identifiers, and discard options ensure that all messages in a group are processed correctly or rolled back if an error occurs?

- A. Message grouping allows related messages to be linked using group identifiers and sequence numbers, ensuring either all messages are processed or none if an error occurs
- B. Message grouping only affects message storage and not processing
- C. Message grouping splits messages without any sequence or recovery mechanism
- D. Grouped messages are treated independently with no rollback capability

Answer: A

Explanation:

Message grouping in IBM MQ allows splitting large datasets into multiple related messages. Group identifiers and sequence numbers maintain order, and if processing fails, the system can roll back the entire group to maintain consistency.
