ISQI ISTQB Certified Tester Advanced Level, Test Automation Engineering Sample Questions (Q17-Q22):

NEW QUESTION # 17

An API's response to a request made to the corresponding endpoint should return some specific data about a payment transaction in JSON format. In particular, your goal is to write the test automation code, keeping it as short as possible, aimed at determining whether that response includes certain properties (transaction_id, amount, status, timestamp) with the data types and formats expected. Assuming that the TAF provides all the necessary support to validate the specified API response, how would you BEST achieve your goal?

- A. Use an artificial intelligence algorithm based on machine learning and image recognition to implement a self-healing capability
- B. Specify the schema for the expected response data (properties, data types, and formats) and validate the actual response data against this schema
- C. Write custom code that parses the actual response data and checks whether the extracted properties, data types, and formats are as expected
- D. Write a single assertion for each property to check whether the data types and formats for that property are as expected in the actual response

Answer: B

Explanation:

TAE encourages using the highest-leverage validation mechanisms available in the framework/tooling to keep tests concise, expressive, and maintainable. When validating JSON responses for presence of fields plus correct data types and formats, schema-based validation (e.g., JSON Schema or an equivalent contract/schema mechanism provided by the TAF) is typically the most efficient approach. It allows you to declare the expected structure once (required properties, types, constraints such as regex/date-time format, numeric ranges) and then validate the whole response in a single operation. This minimizes code and reduces repetitive assertions while producing clearer diagnostics when validation fails. Option B can work but usually results in more lines of code and repeated checks, and it is easier to miss constraints (e.g., timestamp format). Option D increases code volume and duplication by re-implementing parsing and validation logic that the TAF already provides, increasing maintenance burden. Option C is irrelevant to the goal of validating response properties /types/formats. Therefore, specifying an expected schema and validating the response against it is the best way to keep code short and aligned with TAE maintainability recommendations.

NEW QUESTION # 18

You are working on a TAS for standalone application. The automated tests are developed based on a automation framework that allows interaction with GUI elements using on object orientated API. The GUI elements include menus, buttons, radio buttons, text toolbars and their properties.

Whilst automating a test, you have discovered that the GUI elements of some third party components are not identifiable by the automated tool you are using.

Which of the following is the FIRST step that you take to investigate this issue?

- A. Verify whether the GUI identification depends on the browser.
- B. Verify the testability support with the providers of the third party components
- C. Adopt an approach that uses the coordinates of the GUI elements instead
- D. Verify whether naming standards for variables and have been defined for the current automation solution

Answer: B

NEW QUESTION # 19

Which of the following success factors for a test automation project is TRUE?

- A. Automated tests must be designed to capture only the data that is strictly needed for comparing expected and actual results
- B. The test cases to be automated first must always be selected based on the number of times a test will need to be run
- C. Automated tests that fail due to changes in the requirements of the SUT should be promptly fixed rather than disabled from the test suite
- D. The test cases to be automated must have a high dependency on particular data values

Answer: C

NEW QUESTION # 20

A project consists of distributed teams working in a 24-hour environment, where activities happen at all hours of the day. This project adopts a CI (Continuous Integration) process when developer check-in code and consists of automated activities that include generating a build and deploying it to a test environment.

Automated integration tests are run multiple times a day. The project have asked for a report containing the automation test results for every build, which must be available 24/7 to the project team

Which of the following would be the BEST way to automatically provides this report?

- A. Store the execution result of the integration tests for the last build to a database (overwriting the results from the previous build), automatically create a test execution report for this build and send it via e-mail to the project team
- B. Store the code coverage results of the integration tests for the last build to a database (without overwriting the results from the previous builds). And automatically create a chart showing the trend in code coverage and send via email to the project team
- C. Store the execution results of the integration tests for the last build to a database (without overwriting the results from the previous builds) previous builds), use this database to automatically update a dashboard containing the build history and test results accessible to the project team.

- D. Store the execution results of the integration tests for the last build to a database (without overwriting the results from the previous builds). Automatically create a test execution report for this build and send it via e-mail to the project team
