Medical Technology AMCA Phlebotomy Technician Certification Exam Sample Questions (Q279-Q284):

NEW QUESTION # 279

Laboratory accreditation agencies generally require that laboratories follow the standards set by which of the following?

- A. CMS
- B. CLSI
- C. FDA
- D. CAP

Answer: B

Explanation:

Laboratory accreditation agencies generally require that laboratories follow the standards of the CLSI (Clinical and Laboratory Standards Institute). CLSI, a nonprofit membership agency, publishes the Procedures for the Collection of Diagnostic Blood Specimens by Venipuncture: Approved Standard, which outlines the order of draw. CLSI provides voluntary consensus standards, guidelines, and reports as well as supporting products, such as software and wall charts. CLSI is ANSI (American National Standards Institute) accredited.

NEW QUESTION # 280

Capillary action refers to:

- A. The ability of a capillary to dilate
- B. The ability of a liquid to be automatically drawn into a tube without gravity or force
- C. The ability of capillaries to form a bridge between venules and arterioles
- D. The ability of a capillary to constrict

Answer: B

Explanation:

Capillary action refers to the ability of a liquid to be automatically drawn into a tube without gravity or force. Capillary tubes and microhematocrit tubes fill by capillary action, and blood will rise into the tubes if they are held vertically to the blood drop, or blood will flow into the tubes if they are held horizontally to the blood drop. The end of the tube must stay at the drop and should not be moved because air may enter the tube, which may interfere with the test results.

NEW QUESTION # 281

Gloves should generally be donned prior to:

- A. Performing the venipuncture
- B. Placing the tourniquet
- C. Cleansing the skin
- D. Palpating the veins

Answer: C

Explanation:

Gloves should generally be donned prior to cleansing the skin, although with concerns about infection, they may be donned earlier. For example, for COVID-19 precautions, gloves are typically worn for all patient contact. However, the usual procedure is to apply the tourniquet, palpate and select the vein, select the needed supplies, and then don gloves before cleansing the site and carrying out the venipuncture.

NEW QUESTION # 282

If a patient is undergoing analysis of gastric fluids before and after a gastric stimulant, for which blood test is the phlebotomist likely to need to collect a specimen?

- A. Serum gastrin
- B. CBC
- C. Uric acid
- D. Albumin

Answer: A

Explanation:

If a patient is undergoing analysis of gastric fluids before and after a gastric stimulant, the blood test that the phlebotomist is likely to need to collect a specimen for is serum gastrin, which evaluates gastric production. The serum is collected in a red- or gray-topped tube. Gastric fluid analysis and serum gastrin are tested to help diagnose chronic gastritis, chronic renal failure, gastric and duodenal ulcers, gastric carcinoma, G-cell hyperplasia, pernicious anemia, pyloric obstruction, and hyperparathyroidism.

NEW QUESTION # 283

If petechiae are noted on the patient's skin distal to the tourniquet, this suggests that:

- A. The patient is having an allergic reaction.
- B. The patient may have a coagulation defect.
- C. The tourniquet has been on for too long.
- D. The tourniquet has been improperly applied.

Answer: B

Explanation:

If petechiae are noted on the patient's skin distal to the tourniquet, this suggests that the patient may have a coagulation defect, such as thrombocytopenia, and may have excessive bleeding after venipuncture. Other causes of petechiae can include medications (e.g., aspirin, anticoagulants) and some types of infectious/inflammatory disorders. Petechiae are nonraised lesions that are small (<3 mm) in diameter.
