An agile project for a database migration impacts nearly all business units of the corporation. Every effort has been made to complete the migration before the end-of-support date for the database platform. A new impediment now implies the need to continue use of the old platform another year at a higher support price.
What should the product owner do about this situation?

- A. Remove low-value items from the backlog to compensate for the higher cost.
- B. Reprioritize the backlog based on story size and competence availability.
- C. Switch to a predictive approach to prevent any further delays to completion.
- D. Reprioritize the backlog based on value and cost of delay divided by duration.

Answer: D

Explanation:
In an agile project facing a new impediment that affects the timeline and costs, the product owner should focus on maximizing value and minimizing costs. Reprioritizing the backlog based on the value of each item and the cost of delay divided by duration is a strategic approach that aligns with agile principles. This method ensures that the most valuable and time-sensitive work is prioritized, which is crucial when dealing with extended support for an older platform at a higher cost. It allows for a more informed decision-making process that considers the impact of delays on the project's value123.

The stakeholder engagement plan describes the strategies and actions to effectively engage stakeholders throughout the project life cycle, based on their needs, expectations, interests, and influence levels. By reviewing and communicating the stakeholder engagement plan, the project manager can ensure that the stakeholders are aware of their roles and responsibilities, the project objectives and scope, the project performance and progress, and the change management process. This will help to avoid confusion, conflicts, and delays in the project and enhance stakeholder satisfaction and support.
