NEW QUESTION # 132

A scrum team is experiencing lengthy discussions leading to no concrete actions during their scrum events. The scrum master determines that these inefficient meetings are producing waste. What should the scrum master do to make the meetings more efficient?

- A. Remind the team that staying on topic during meetings is part of being a self-managing team.
- B. Remind the team of the purpose of each scrum event, and implement a policy that long conversations deviating from the scope of each event will be stopped.
- C. Issue fixed agendas and a decision log for all scrum events to ensure that only relevant agenda points are discussed and decisions are appropriately captured.
- D. Ask the product owner to conduct these discussions in individual meetings with the team members.

Answer: B

Explanation:

The scrum master should first remind the team of the purpose and goals of each scrum event (such as the daily standup, sprint planning, sprint review, and retrospective) to ensure that they remain focused on their intended outcomes. The scrum master can then implement a policy that ensures discussions that deviate from the scope of the event are stopped. This approach keeps the team on track, prevents time-wasting conversations, and helps maintain the efficiency of the events.

This method empowers the team to stay focused on what is essential for each event and encourages self-management while still providing room for relevant discussions. In doing so, the team can achieve the desired outcomes of each scrum event without unnecessary delays.

NEW QUESTION # 135

A user interface (UI) developer has features for channels ready for review. During the team review, the architect is disappointed that Splunk software has not been implemented for better server and client logs. The architect insists on the implementation of Splunk software, which will impact the release date.

Which one of the following is the ideal option for the team to resolve this conflict?

- A. Inform the sponsor that features are being added and will extend the release date after getting approval and communicating this to the architect.
- B. Have the team brainstorm and propose error logging at the client level, which will have a higher impact with less effort within the release timeline.
- C. Ask the developer to build and let the testing be postponed until after the release, and inform the architect that the feature will be implemented.
- D. The product owner should explain to the architect that monitoring, alerting, and logging are not essential for the customer and can be prioritized post-release.

Answer: B

Explanation:

The ideal way to resolve the conflict is to encourage the team to brainstorm and propose an alternative solution that meets the intent of the architect's request (error logging) but with a solution that fits within the current release timeline. By implementing error logging at the client level, the team can still address the monitoring and logging needs without significantly delaying the release. This approach fosters collaboration, balances priorities, and focuses on delivering value within the agreed timeline.
