Answer: A,B,C,D

NEW QUESTION # 119

Which of the following statements are true about NAC?

- A. Portal authentication applies to scenarios where users are scattered and move frequently, for example, guest authentication.
- B. In most cases, MAC address authentication requires manual MAC address registration, complicating management.
- C. 802.1X authentication has low requirements on the client software of user terminals and therefore can be flexibly deployed.
- D. 802.1X authentication is applicable to newly deployed networks with highly centralized users and high information security requirements.

Answer: A,B,D

Explanation:

Network Access Control (NAC) is a critical security framework for managing endpoint access to a network.

The HCSP-Presales-Campus Network Planning and Design V1.0 documentation outlines various NAC methods and their characteristics:

A: MAC Address Authentication: This method relies on the unique MAC address of a device for authentication. In most cases, it requires administrators to manually register MAC addresses in a database (e.g., on a RADIUS server), which increases management complexity, especially in large or dynamic networks.

This statement is true.

B: 802.1X Authentication Requirements: Contrary to the statement, 802.1X authentication typically has high requirements for client software, as it requires a supplicant (e.g., a compatible client supporting EAP) to be installed and configured on user terminals. This limits its flexibility in environments with diverse or unmanaged devices, making the statement false.

C: 802.1X Authentication Applicability: 802.1X is ideal for newly deployed networks with centralized user bases (e.g., enterprise campuses) and stringent security needs, as it enforces strong authentication (e.g., via EAP-TLS). This aligns with its use in controlled, high-security environments, making the statement true.
