EXAM CRAM The Network+ Cram Sheet

This Cram Sheet contains the distilled key facts about the CompTIA Network+ exam. Review this information as the last thing you do before you enter the testing center, paying special attention to those areas in which you think you need the most review. You can transfer any of these facts from your head onto a blank sheet of paper immediately before you begin the exam.

Networking Fundamentals

▶ As data is passed up or down through the OSI model structure, headers are added (going down) or removed (going up) at each layer—a process called encapsulation (when added) or decapsulation (when removed).

Table 1 — Summary of the OSI Model

OSI Layer	Description
Application (Layer 7)	Provides access to the network for applications and certain end-user functions. Displays incoming information and prepares outgoing information for network access.
Presentation (Layer 6)	Converts data from the application layer into a format that can be sent over the network. Converts data from the session layer into a format that the application layer can understand. Encrypts and decrypts data. Provides compression and decompression functionality.
Session (Layer 5)	Synchronizes the data exchange between applications on separate devices. Handles error detection and notification to the peer layer on the other device.
Transport (Layer 4)	Establishes, maintains, and breaks connections between two devices. Determines the ordering and priorities of data. Performs error checking and verification and handles retransmissions if necessary.
Network (Layer 3)	Provides mechanisms for the routing of data between devices across single or multiple network segments. Handles the discovery of destination systems and addressing.
Data link (Layer 2)	Has two distinct sublayers: link layer control (LLC) and media access control (MAC). Performs error detection and handling for the transmitted signals. Defines the method by which the medium is accessed. Defines hardware addressing through the MAC sublayer.
Physical (Layer 1)	Defines the network's physical structure. Defines voltage/signal rates and the physical connection methods. Defines the physical topology.

- ▶ A local-area network (LAN) is a data network that is restricted to a single geographic location and typically encompasses a relatively small area, such as an office building or school. The function of the LAN is to interconnect workstation computers and devices for the purpose of sharing files and resources.
- ▶ A wide-area network (WAN) is a network that spans more than one geographic location, often connecting separated LANs. WANs are slower than LANs and often require additional and costly hardware such as routers, dedicated leased lines, and complicated implementation procedures.
- ▶ Personal multiple LANs within that limited geographical area are usually called a campus-area network (CAN). CAN may have nothing to do with a college but consists of office buildings in an enterprise "campus," industrial complex, military base, or anywhere else. In reality, a CAN is a WAN, but what makes it distinct is the confined geographic area it includes.
- ▶ A personal-area network (PAN) is essentially a LAN created to share data among devices associated with you. Wireless technologies have taken PAN further and introduced a new term—wireless personal-area network (WPAN). WPAN refers to the technologies involved in connecting devices in very close proximity to exchange data or resources, usually through the use of Bluetooth, infrared, or near-field communication (NFC).
- ▶ A software-defined wide-area network (SDWAN) is an extension of software-defined networking (SDN), which is commonly used in telecom and data centers, on a large scale. The concept behind it is to take many of the principles that make cloud computing so attractive and make them accessible at the WAN level.
