Answer: C

Explanation:

Explanation

The next step to enable the communication between the forwarder and the deployment server after installing a new forwarder with a manually created deploymentclient.conf is to restart Splunk on the deployment client.

The deploymentclient.conf file contains the settings for the deployment client, which is a Splunk instance that receives updates from the deployment server. The file must include the targetUri attribute, which specifies the hostname and management port of the deployment server. To apply the changes in the deploymentclient.conf file, Splunk must be restarted on the deployment client.

Therefore, option C is the correct answer.

- A. When the maximum warm bucket size has been reached.
- B. When Splunk is restarted.
- C. When the maximum number of warm buckets is reached.
- D. When the maximum warm bucket age has been reached.

Answer: C

Explanation:

<https://docs.splunk.com/Documentation/Splunk/8.1.1/Indexer/HowSplunkstoresindexes> Once further conditions are met (for example, the index reaches some maximum number of warm buckets), the indexer begins to roll the warm buckets to cold, based on their age. It always selects the oldest warm bucket to roll to cold. Buckets continue to roll to cold as they age in this manner. Cold buckets reside in a different location from hot and warm buckets. You can configure the location so that cold buckets reside on cheaper storage.
