What is an advantage of device-level management as compared to controller-level management to automate the configuration of network devices?

- A. Device-level management supports REST API-enabled devices and controller-level management does not.
- B. Device-level management has access to all devices from a single point on the network and controller-level management does not.
- C. Device-level management requires one controller per vendor and controller-level management does not.
- D. Device-level management supports all subsets of the potential device settings and controller-level management does not.

Answer: D

Explanation:

Device-level management allows for more granular control over the specific settings and configurations of individual network devices. This is beneficial in scenarios where fine-tuning of device settings is required, and where certain configurations may not be exposed or supported by the overarching controller. Controller-level management, on the other hand, abstracts many device-specific settings to provide a more uniform and simplified management interface, which may not support all the detailed configurations available at the device level.
