Explanation

Onboarding is one of the six activities in the service value chain, which is the set of interconnected activities that an organization performs to deliver a valuable product or service to its consumers and other stakeholders¹. Onboarding involves providing the consumer with the agreed service and ensuring that they can use it as intended¹. This includes building awareness of the new consumer, such as informing them about the service features, benefits, and costs, as well as ensuring resources are prepared for service provision, such as allocating staff, equipment, and facilities². Negotiating service targets with customers is part of the engage activity, which involves understanding the needs and expectations of the stakeholders and establishing agreements on how to meet them¹. Designing the service components and infrastructure is part of the design and transition activity, which involves ensuring that products and services continually meet stakeholder expectations for quality, costs, and time to market¹.
