A notification to the Microsoft Authenticator app can be used to authenticate self-service password reset (SSPR).	○	○
To perform self-service password reset (SSPR), a user must already be signed in and authenticated to Azure AD.	○	○

Explanation:

An external email address can be used to authenticate self-service password reset (SSPR). # Yes A notification to the Microsoft Authenticator app can be used to authenticate self-service password reset (SSPR). # Yes To perform self-service password reset (SSPR), a user must already be signed in and authenticated to Azure AD. # No For Microsoft Entra self-service password reset (SSPR), users must register one or more authentication methods that can later be used when they forget their password or are locked out. Microsoft's end-user guidance states that an email address option lets users configure "an alternate email address that can be used without requiring your forgotten or missing password," and that this method is available only for password reset. In practice, this alternate address is typically a personal or external email (for example, Gmail), so using an external email to authenticate SSPR is valid.

SSPR can also use the Microsoft Authenticator app as an authentication method. Microsoft documents that Authenticator push notifications, including number matching, are supported for several scenarios, explicitly listing self-service password reset (SSPR) among them. This means a push notification to the app on the user' s device can be used to verify identity during SSPR.

Finally, SSPR is designed for situations where the user cannot sign in. Official SSPR process descriptions explain that users start from the "Can't access your account?" or password-reset page, provide their username, and then use their registered methods to prove identity. They do not need to be already authenticated to Azure AD; SSPR exists precisely to recover access when sign-in fails.
