Nursing Neonatal Nurse Practitioner Exam Sample Questions (Q72-Q77):

NEW QUESTION # 72

A condition that prevents a newborn from being able to pass air to breathe after birth is

- A. bilateral choanal atresia
- B. pneumonia
- C. meconium aspiration

Answer: A

Explanation:

Bilateral choanal atresia occurs when the back of the nasal passages are blocked, preventing a newborn from being able to breathe. This occurs due to a bony or soft tissue abnormality during development in utero. The back of the nasal passages fail to open, resulting in the inability to pass air. Infants are obligatory nasal breathers and immediate airway assistance is usually necessary at birth. This condition can be surgically corrected, but may require additional surgeries to widen the opening as the child matures. Neither meconium aspiration nor pneumonia affect the neonate's ability to pass air through the lungs, though both can also lead to respiratory distress.

NEW QUESTION # 73

At which point in a pregnancy is the fetus most likely to suffer birth defects due to a Varicella infection in the mother?

- A. Second trimester
- B. Third trimester
- C. First trimester

Answer: A

Explanation:

The risk of birth defects due to Varicella infection is greatest in the second trimester. The risk at that point is approximately 2%, up from 0.5-1% in the first trimester. If the fetus contracts Varicella late in the pregnancy, there is a chance they will develop chicken pox rather than birth defects. Varicella infection can be severe in utero and may lead to small head size and intellectual disabilities.

NEW QUESTION # 74

A pediatric patient in the NICU is receiving an infusion of dopamine. Once it is completed, the effects from the medication should be gone

- A. within 1 hour
- B. within 10 minutes
- C. within 30 minutes

Answer: B

Explanation:

The half-life of dopamine is less than 2 minutes, so the total time in which the effects from the medication are seen is around 10 minutes. Dopamine is used to improve heart function, increase blood pressure, and increase renal perfusion.

NEW QUESTION # 75

In which group is hypoxic ischemic encephalopathy more common?

- A. All infants, regardless of age, are at equal risk
- B. Premature infants
- C. Full-term infants

Answer: C

Explanation:

Hypoxic ischemic encephalopathy is more common in full-term infants than premature infants. This condition results in damage or death to brain tissue due to lack of oxygen to the brain.

It can occur when there is any condition, maternal or fetal, that results in a disruption in oxygenation of brain tissue. This can include a prolapsed cord, placental abruption, maternal hypotension, and others. This is the leading cause of impairment in newborns, though severity of the impairment may not be determined until 3 or 4 years of age.

NEW QUESTION # 76

The neural tube defect in which there is failure of the vertebral column to close, but no herniation through the opening is

- A. spina bifida cystica
- B. spina bifida occulta
- C. myelomeningocele

Answer: B

Explanation:

Spina bifida occulta is the failure of the vertebral column to close, but no herniation through the opening so the defect may not be obvious. Spina bifida is a defect in which the vertebral column is not closed with varying degrees of herniation through the opening. Spina bifida cystica is a defect in closure with external sac-like protrusion with varying degrees of nerve involvement.

Meningocele is spina bifida cystica with meningeal sac filled with spinal fluid. Myelomeningocele is spina bifida cystica with meningeal sac containing spinal fluid and part of the spinal cord and nerves.
