NEW QUESTION # 205
When provisioning an Azure Cosmos DB account, which feature provides redundancy within an Azure region?

- A. the strong consistency level
- B. multi-master replication
- C. Availability Zones
- D. automatic failover

Answer: C

Explanation:
Explanation
With Availability Zone (AZ) support, Azure Cosmos DB will ensure replicas are placed across multiple zones within a given region to provide high availability and resiliency to zonal failures.
Note: Azure Cosmos DB provides high availability in two primary ways. First, Azure Cosmos DB replicates data across regions configured within a Cosmos account. Second, Azure Cosmos DB maintains 4 replicas of data within a region.

NEW QUESTION # 206
Read the statement - "In relational databases, all the values in a column will have the same data type." Choose the correct option with respect to the given statement.

- A. No
- B. Yes

Answer: B

Explanation:
A relational database stores data and provides access to data points that are related to each other. A relational database follows the basic relational model that is a simple and straightforward method of storing data in tables. Each row of the table in a relational database represents a record with a unique id i.e. key. Each column of the table holds an attribute of the data, and each record represents the value for each attribute.
For example, a table STUDENT_RECORD represents the record of students in a class and the attributes of columns are - Student_Id, Student_Name, Student_Branch, and Student_Marks. We need to define the data type of each attribute in the beginning at the time of the creation of the table. Here, if we set Student_Id as a number, all the values in the column Student_Id will contain numbers only. And if we set it as alphanumeric, all the values in the column Student_Id will contain both alphabets and numbers.

| Student_Id	Student_Name	Student_Class	Student_Marks
1001	John	CS	903
1002	Koe	EC	678
1003	Faiz	IT	782
1004	Kally	ME	876

So, Option A is correct.
