Adobe Real-Time CDP Business Practitioner Professional Sample Questions (Q39-Q44):

NEW QUESTION # 39

A data architect for a global retailer wants to ingest batch data into Adobe Real-Time Customer Data Platform. The data consists of a large number of customer profiles that need to be loaded in bulk. The architect is also looking to reduce the load on the infrastructure while maintaining high throughput. Which method would the architect use to load batch data into the Adobe Real-Time CDP effectively?

- A. Using a single HTTP API request to send a batch of messages
- B. Using the Batch Ingestion API with specified batch sizes
- C. Using the Adobe Real-Time Customer Data Platform directly without APIs

Answer: B

Explanation:

For high-volume data loading, the Batch Ingestion API is the architecturally sound choice for maintaining high throughput while managing system resources effectively. Unlike streaming ingestion, which processes messages individually, the Batch Ingestion API allows for the uploading of large data files (such as Parquet or JSON) that are processed as a single unit of work.

To optimize infrastructure load, the architect should utilize specified batch sizes. Adobe Experience Platform provides a "Large File Upload" workflow within the Batch Ingestion API that allows developers to break a single large file into smaller chunks, which are then stitched together on the platform side. This prevents timeouts and memory issues on the client-side infrastructure while ensuring the platform's ingestion engine can process the data in a scalable manner.

Option A is incorrect because a single HTTP API request is typically used for streaming or small payloads, not bulk profile loading. Option B is not a technical method, as even the UI utilizes these underlying APIs. By leveraging the Batch Ingestion API, the retailer can ensure that millions of profile records are validated against XDM schemas and moved into the Data Lake and Real-Time Customer Profilestore with high efficiency and robust error reporting.
