Huawei HCIA-Security V4.0 Sample Questions (Q95-Q100):

NEW QUESTION # 95

Which of the following descriptions about firewall logs is incorrect?

- A. Administrators can learn the security policies that traffic hits through the policy matching log, which can be used to locate faults when problems occur.
- B. Among the log levels, Emergency is the most serious level.
- C. According to the severity or urgency of the information, logs can be divided into 8 levels. The more serious the information, the greater the log level value.
- D. Administrators can learn user behavior, search keywords, and the effectiveness of audit policy configurations through user activity logs.

Answer: C

NEW QUESTION # 96

Which of the following are the default zones of Huawei firewalls?

- A. Trust
- B. Untrust
- C. Local
- D. DMZ

Answer: A,B,C,D

Explanation:

Huawei firewalls use security zones to group interfaces that share the same trust level and security policy requirements. In the default configuration, Huawei firewalls provide four built-in zones that cover the most common deployment scenarios.

Trust represents the internal network where users and servers are typically considered more reliable. Untrust represents external networks such as the Internet, where traffic is considered untrusted and usually requires stricter access control and security inspection. DMZ is designed for semi-public servers (for example, web or mail servers) that must be reachable from Untrust but should be isolated from the Trust network to reduce lateral movement risk if a DMZ host is compromised. Local is a special zone that represents the firewall device itself (management plane and control plane). Traffic destined to or originating from the firewall (such as management access, routing protocol packets, or local services) is associated with the Local zone and is controlled using dedicated policies.

Because these four zones are pre-defined and available by default, all listed options are correct.
