NEW QUESTION # 425

Members of an agile team are complaining that user stories are too large, taking multiple sprints to complete them. They say this way of working is becoming difficult to handle and it has been challenging to map relationships between stories. This situation is affecting the value delivery for the product owner.

What should the scrum master do to handle this situation?

- A. Replace user stories into features.
- B. Organize user stories into epics.
- C. Separate large user stories.
- D. Apply work-in-progress limits.

Answer: C

Explanation:

Large user stories, also known as "epic" user stories, can be challenging to manage and lead to difficulties in tracking progress and delivering value incrementally. The Scrum Master should work with the team to break down large user stories into smaller, more manageable pieces. These smaller stories can be completed within a single sprint, allowing the team to deliver value more frequently and with greater clarity.
