NEW QUESTION # 2024

A project manager starts to receive emails from different stakeholders requesting information about the project status. What should the project manager do to avoid this in the future?

- A. Schedule weekly project status meetings with all stakeholders including the customer and internal resources.
- B. Designate a team member to respond to the emails from these stakeholders.
- C. Include the stakeholders' emails in all of the project status communications.
- D. Include the project stakeholders' needs while planning the project communications strategy.

Answer: D

Explanation:

The best approach for a project manager in this situation is to include the project stakeholders' needs while planning the project communications strategy. This ensures that all stakeholders are considered and their information needs are met in a structured way, which can prevent the need for them to send individual emails requesting information. According to the PMBOK Guide, the communications management plan is a key component of the overall project management plan and outlines how project communications will be planned, structured, implemented, and monitored for effectiveness. It includes stakeholder communication requirements, information to be communicated, methods or media for communication, time frames, and frequency of communication, which aligns with option B1.
