- A. It reveals the attacker's IP infrastructure
- B. It reflects the attacker's operational preferences
- C. It confirms the exploit used for initial access
- D. It identifies the malware family used

The correct answer isit reflects the attacker's operational preferences. Attribution relies on understanding how attackers operate, not just what tools they use.
Operational preferences-such as avoiding PowerShell logging, disabling AMSI, and favoring WMI-are behavioral signatures. These patterns often persist across campaigns and are documented in threat intelligence reports associated with specific adversaries.
Option A is incorrect because malware families change frequently. Option B is unreliable due to infrastructure rotation. Option D is unrelated to post-access tradecraft.
