A customer is evaluating a new disaster-recovery solution for their SAN, which is used for noncritical CRM purposes. The SAN is frequently backed up locally at the customer's existing single location, and several hours of data loss can be sustained. The customer wants to retain complete control of the failover process to a separate physical location. Which type of DR is most suitable for the customer?

- A. warm standby
- B. active/passive
- C. cold standby
- D. active/active

Answer: C

Explanation:

A cold standby DR solution involves keeping the backup systems powered off or idle until a disaster happens.

No data is actively synchronized, and manual effort is required to bring systems online.

It's low-cost, manual, and has the longest recovery time - perfect for noncritical workloads.

Since the system is noncritical and several hours of downtime/data loss are acceptable, cold standby offers just the right level of investment and control.
