NEW QUESTION # 200

The most significant concern about using off-the-shelf software for statistical process control (SPC) analysis is the

- A. large number of charts that need to be analyzed
- B. reduced need for training in SPC tools and concepts
- C. resistance to automating a system that currently uses human monitoring
- D. misapplication of SPC results and incorrect conclusions

Answer: D

Explanation:

The use of off-the-shelf software for SPC analysis can lead to the misapplication of SPC results and incorrect conclusions. This is because the software may not be tailored to the specific processes and nuances of the organization using it. Without proper understanding and training in SPC principles, users may incorrectly interpret the data, leading to decisions that could adversely affect quality. It's crucial for users to have a solid foundation in SPC tools and concepts to effectively use any SPC software and ensure accurate analysis.

NEW QUESTION # 202

When a quality manager develops a long-term strategy for quality within an organization, which of the following is the first step?

- A. Developing the quality mission statement
- B. Assigning staff to assist in the effort
- C. Establishing benchmarks
- D. Interviewing line personnel

Answer: A

Explanation:

Developing a quality mission statement is crucial because it sets the overall direction and purpose for quality initiatives within the organization. It articulates the organization's commitment to quality, its goals, and its vision for achieving excellence. The mission statement provides a clear framework for subsequent actions, including establishing benchmarks, interviewing line personnel, and assigning staff to assist in quality improvement efforts. However, without a well-defined mission statement, other steps may lack focus and alignment with the organization's strategic objectives¹.
