NEW QUESTION # 1002

A project manager is leading a hybrid project that is building an app for a travel industry startup. Due to unforeseen events, the features and the overall solution will not be useable by many customers due to new travel restrictions.

What should the project manager do first?

- A. Release the team and help them achieve their potential on a new project.
- B. Ask the organization's management for advice regarding the project's direction.

- C. Pause the project if business value cannot be reached and collect lessons learned.
- D. Assess the environmental changes and recommend a pivot for the project.

Answer: D

Explanation:

When unforeseen events affect the usability of a project's deliverables, the project manager should first assess the environmental changes. This involves understanding the impact of the new travel restrictions on the project's objectives and deliverables. Based on this assessment, the project manager should then recommend a pivot for the project to align with the new reality and ensure that the project still delivers value. This approach is supported by the PMBOK Guide, which emphasizes the importance of responding to changes and aligning project objectives with business needs.
