NEW QUESTION # 49

A dashboard designer at Cloud Kicks creates a dashboard in CRM Analytics. The designer notices fields display on the dashboard with their API labels, such as "AccountId.Industry", and wants to change this behavior. The designer also notices that the fields and their order appear to randomly change when a values table is created. What should the CRM Analytics consultant explain to help the designer?

- A. The field labels can only be changed in the widget properties in the dashboard edit mode.
- B. The default fields in a values table and the field labels can be modified in the dataset explorer.
- C. The default fields in a values table can be changed by reordering how fields appear in the JSON of the value table.

Answer: B

Explanation:

For the scenario at Cloud Kicks where fields display with their API labels and the fields in a values table seem to change order randomly, the correct approach is to modify these settings in the dataset explorer within CRM Analytics. This allows for a more intuitive display and control over how data is presented in dashboards.

Here's how these adjustments help:

* Modifying Field Labels: Changing the field labels from their API names to more user-friendly names enhances readability and user experience. This can be done directly in the dataset explorer, which affects how fields appear across all dashboards utilizing that dataset.

* Controlling Field Order: The order of fields in a values table can seem random if not explicitly set. By using the dataset explorer, a designer can specify the order in which fields appear, which then reflects consistently in the dashboard's values table.

This functionality is part of CRM Analytics' aim to provide flexible and customizable data visualization tools.

Training on these features is available through various Salesforce Trailhead modules that discuss dashboard and dataset customization techniques, providing practical insights and guided tutorials to enhance dashboard design and user interaction.

Both these explanations are consistent with best practices as outlined in Salesforce's CRM Analytics documentation and the Trailhead educational content, ensuring that users are well-equipped to leverage the full capabilities of CRM Analytics for effective data management and presentation.
