HPE Aruba Networking ClearPass Exam Sample Questions (Q78-Q83):

NEW QUESTION # 78

An IT administrator attempts to join a ClearPass server to an Active Directory domain. They notice that the system clocks of the ClearPass server and the AD domain are not in sync. The ClearPass server is 10 minutes behind the AD domain. What will be the likely outcome of this attempt to join the domain?

- A. The join will succeed but ClearPass will generate a warning about the clock skew.
- B. The join will fail because Active Directory only allows a maximum of five minutes of clock skew.
- C. The join will succeed because ClearPass automatically adjusts the clock skew during the join process.

Answer: B

Explanation:

The domain join will fail because Active Directory enforces a maximum allowable clock skew of five minutes between systems for Kerberos authentication. Since the ClearPass server is 10 minutes behind, the Kerberos ticket validation will fail, preventing the join operation.

NEW QUESTION # 79

An IT manager needs to ensure that a user who has lost their smartphone can onboard a new device while blocking access to the old one. What steps should the IT manager follow to meet this need using ClearPass Onboard?

- A. Revoke the certificate of the old device, delete all metadata, and onboard the new device.
- B. Block access to the old device, revoke its certificate, and issue a new certificate to the new device.
- C. Delete the user account, create a new account for the user, and onboard the new device.

Answer: B

Explanation:

The IT manager should block access to the old device, revoke its certificate, and then issue a new certificate for the replacement device. This ensures that the lost smartphone can no longer authenticate while allowing the user to securely onboard the new device through ClearPass Onboard.

NEW QUESTION # 80

A network administrator is configuring a ClearPass service to enhance security by integrating multiple authentication and authorization sources. They decided to use Active Directory (AD) for both authentication and authorization and integrated mobile device management for device validation. What advantage does this configuration provide in terms of security and user management?

- A. It allows for comprehensive user credential validation and provides additional context about the device's security status.
- B. It eliminates the need for OnGuard and Onboard services in ClearPass.
- C. It enables the network administrator to bypass the need for user account attributes in the Active Directory.

Answer: A

Explanation:

Using Active Directory for authentication and authorization along with mobile device management (MDM) integration enables ClearPass to validate user credentials and assess device compliance.

This combined approach strengthens security by ensuring both the user's identity and the device's posture meet organizational access policies.

NEW QUESTION # 81

NEW QUESTION # 82

A fitness club has implemented a new security system. Members must scan their membership card at the entrance to gain access. The system verifies the card against the club's database to check the membership status. If the membership is active, access is granted. Which phase of this process is similar to a network access model?

- A. Authentication involves verifying the credentials and validating the account status.
- B. Accounting, because it involves tracking the usage of the club facilities.
- C. Authorization, because it involves granting permissions based on membership type.

Answer: A

Explanation:

This process corresponds to authentication, where the system verifies the member's credentials (membership card) and validates their status in the database before granting access. It mirrors how ClearPass or any AAA system confirms user identity before network access is authorized.
