NEW QUESTION # 134

A DevOps engineer is integrating multiple systems. Each system has its own API that exchanges data based on different application-level transactions. Which of the following delivery mechanisms would best support this integration?

- A. RPC
- B. Socket
- C. Queue
- D. Enterprise service bus

Answer: D

Explanation:

An Enterprise Service Bus (ESB) is designed to facilitate application integration by providing a centralized architecture for high-level, message-based, and event-driven communication between different systems. It is particularly well-suited for integrating multiple systems with their own APIs because it can handle various data formats and protocols, enabling different applications to communicate with each other seamlessly. ### NEW QUESTION # 135

A cloud solutions architect needs to design a solution that will collect a report and upload it to an object storage service every time a virtual machine is gracefully or non-gracefully stopped. Which of the following will best satisfy this requirement?

- A. An API of the object-defined storage service that will scrape the stopped VM disk and self-upload the required files as objects
- B. Creating a webhook that will trigger on VM shutdown API calls and upload the requested files from the volume attached to the VM into the object-defined storage service
- C. A script embedded on the stopping VM's OS that will upload the logs on system shutdown
- D. An event-driven architecture that will send a message when the VM shuts down to a log-collecting function that extracts and uploads the log directly from the storage volume

Answer: D

Explanation:

An event-driven architecture is suited for this scenario, where an event (like a VM shutdown) triggers a function to execute specific tasks (log collection and upload). This approach is efficient and ensures that the logs are collected and uploaded to an object storage service every time the VM is stopped, regardless of whether it is a graceful or non-graceful shutdown.
