NEW QUESTION # 662
A penetration tester evaluates a secure web application using HTTPS, secure cookies, and multi-factor authentication. To hijack a legitimate user's session without triggering alerts, which technique should be used?

- A. Implement a man-in-the-middle attack by compromising a trusted network device
- B. Utilize a session token replay attack by capturing encrypted tokens
- C. Perform a Cross-Site Request Forgery (CSRF) attack to manipulate session tokens
- D. Exploit a browser zero-day vulnerability to inject malicious scripts

Answer: C

Explanation:
CEH v13 describes Cross-Site Request Forgery (CSRF) as a technique that forces authenticated users to unknowingly execute actions within a web application without their intent. Unlike session hijacking methods that require stealing or replaying session cookies, CSRF exploits the trust relationship that the server has with a user's browser. Even with HTTPS, secure cookies, and MFA, once a user is authenticated, the browser automatically sends session cookies with each request. If the attacker convinces the victim to load a maliciously crafted webpage or URL, the browser sends a forged request to the target application, executing actions under the user's authenticated session. CEH notes that secure cookies and MFA do not stop CSRF because no credentials are stolen-only forced actions occur. This technique is sophisticated because it leaves minimal traces, avoids direct cookie manipulation, bypasses robust authentication mechanisms, and leverages design weaknesses rather than technical misconfigurations. Protection typically requires anti-CSRF tokens and proper origin validation.
