NEW QUESTION # 172

A company is transitioning from a predictive to agile delivery of projects. Based on the requirements, the project team estimates the budget and decides to use a fixed-price contract with its vendor. However, during the execution of the project, the requirements evolve and priorities start to change constantly, which puts the project and the estimate at completion (EAC) off by 40%. What should the project manager do next?

- A. Meet with the stakeholders to recommend the use of a time and materials (T & M) contract to address the problem
- B. Submit a change request to the financial manager to increase the funding and continue as is.
- C. Wait until the next gate review meeting to highlight the risk of low funds to the stakeholders.
- D. Send a detailed status report highlighting the issue with funding to all of the stakeholders.

Answer: A

Explanation:

The project manager should meet with the stakeholders to recommend the use of a time and materials (T & M) contract to address the problem, as this type of contract is more suitable for agile projects that have changing requirements and priorities. A T & M contract allows the buyer to pay the seller based on the actual hours of work and the cost of materials, rather than a fixed price. This can provide more flexibility and adaptability for the project, and reduce the risk of budget overrun. The other options are not as effective or appropriate as recommending a T & M contract. Sending a detailed status report may inform the stakeholders of the issue, but it does not propose a solution. Submitting a change request may increase the funding, but it does not address the root cause of the problem, which is the mismatch between the contract type and the project approach. Waiting until the next gate review meeting may delay the resolution of the problem, and increase the likelihood of further deviation from the EAC. References:

NEW QUESTION # 173

At a recent steering committee meeting, the project sponsor asked the project team to add a major feature to the final product. After consulting with the project team, it is determined that the change will cause significant impacts to the original project delivery date and budget.

What should the project manager do to assess the priorities and meet the new objective?

- A. Ask the project team to work overtime in order to accommodate the new changes.
- B. Initiate a crashing routine to gain extra time for the added feature.
- C. Submit a change order request with the new project objective to the project management office (PMO).
- D. Communicate the results and negotiate the needed resources and time with the stakeholder.

Answer: D

Explanation:

When a major feature is requested by the project sponsor that significantly impacts the project's delivery date and budget, the project manager should communicate these impacts to the stakeholders. This involves presenting the results of the impact analysis and negotiating for the necessary resources and time to accommodate the new feature. This approach ensures that the stakeholders are fully informed of the implications and can make decisions based on the project's best interest. It aligns with the PMBOK guide's emphasis on stakeholder engagement and communication as key aspects of effective change management¹.
