If image clarity changes are made within the camera web interface, but are not reflected within a Video Management Software

(VMS), what is the most likely cause of the camera not accepting the settings?

- A. The VMS is overwriting the changes in the camera
- B. The user does not have administrative rights to change the settings
- C. The camera is faulty and needs to be replaced
- D. The camera's advanced settings need to be changed first

Answer: A

Explanation:

When changes made to image clarity within the camera web interface are not reflected within a Video Management Software (VMS), it is often due to the VMS having its settings and configurations that can overwrite those made directly on the camera. Many VMS solutions are designed to manage and standardize settings across multiple cameras, ensuring consistency in video quality and performance. This functionality can override local changes made on the camera interface. According to Axis Network Video documentation, this behavior is typical in integrated systems where VMS settings take precedence to maintain uniformity across all connected devices.
