Practical Assignment Application: Choosing the Mean vs. Median

- The Mean (Average): Sums all numerical records and divides by total record counts. This calculation is highly sensitive to extreme outliers.
- The Median (Middle Data Value): Represents the absolute center data row when numbers are arranged sequentially. This is a robust metric because it splits data into equal halves, making it less sensitive to extreme values.

Context Case: If you review human body weight trends where most data clusters between 50–100 kg but contains extreme right-skewed outlier values (e.g., pathological weights over 200 kg), the Mean is pulled artificially upward (e.g., $\approx 79.3 \text{ kg}$). In this case, the Median stays near the true data center (e.g., $\approx 72.9 \text{ kg}$). Use the Median to describe skewed datasets with extreme outliers.

3. Tabular Architecture: Data Frames, Tibbles, and Flat File Imports

R organizes large grids into structured table storage systems. Modern data analysis uses specialized variations of base tables.

Tibbles vs. Standard Data Frames (Base R Tables)

Tibbles are enhanced data grids that enforce strict formatting rules to prevent common errors:

- Structural Extraction Stability: Slicing rows using a single bracket index `[]` always yields a clean, structured tibble grid. Double bracket references `[[]` or the literal dollar indicator `[$]` bypass the grid structure to extract a clean raw data vector.
- Elimination of Partial Character Matching: Bypasses base R's silent column matching behavior. If a target column name does not match exactly, a tibble safely stops execution and yields `NULL`, rather than pulling data from an unintended, partially named column.
- Output Length Limits: When running commands, tibbles automatically truncate long preview screens to fit your active window, preventing terminal flood errors.

Data File Import Functions (The `readr` Library Ecosystem)

To read an external spreadsheet table into R, match your file import function to the specific column separator symbol used in the file:

- `read_csv("dataset.csv")` : Imports flat data files where columns are separated by commas (,).
- `read_csv2("dataset2.csv")` : Imports European style flat text files where columns are separated by semicolons (;) and numbers use commas for decimals.
- `read_tsv("dataset.tsv")` : Imports text files where columns are separated by clear tab spacing blocks.
- `read_delim("dataset.txt", delim = "|")` : Imports customized text layouts by explicitly matching the separator character provided to the `delim` argument (e.g., matching a pipe symbol |).
