A BIG-IP system receives UDP traffic from a specific source. The administrator wants the traffic to be forwarded, not dropped or rejected. Which virtual server type should be used? (Choose one answer)

- A. Drop
- B. Standard
- C. Block
- D. Reject

Answer: B

Explanation:
Comprehensive and Detailed Explanation From BIG-IP Administration Data Plane Concepts documents:
BIG-IP virtual server types define how traffic is handled at the data plane when it matches a virtual server's destination address and service port.
According to BIG-IP Administration Data Plane Concepts:
Standard virtual server
The default and most commonly used type
Accepts client connections and forwards traffic to pool members
Supports both TCP and UDP traffic
Allows full use of profiles (UDP, FastL4, persistence, etc.) and iRules Required when the goal is to process and pass traffic through BIG-IP Drop virtual server Silently discards matching traffic No response is sent to the client Reject virtual server Actively rejects traffic by sending an error response For UDP, BIG-IP may send an ICMP unreachable message Block virtual server Used to block traffic at the virtual server level Traffic is neither forwarded nor processed by pools In this scenario:
The administrator explicitly wants the UDP traffic to be forwarded
Only a Standard virtual server forwards traffic to a pool or next-hop destination Why the Other Options Are Incorrect:
A . Drop - Traffic is silently discarded
B . Reject - Traffic is actively rejected
C . Block - Traffic is blocked and not forwarded
Key Data Plane Concept Reinforced:
When traffic must be accepted and forwarded-regardless of whether it is TCP or UDP-the BIG-IP administrator must use a Standard virtual server, which is the only virtual server type designed for normal application traffic processing.
