NEW QUESTION # 57

Your client is researching the acquisition of a new company and wants to collaborate on the acquisition in Slack. The acquisition would be a long-term process and would need input from many departments from different workspaces, including finance and legal. Given that the acquisition is still in consideration, this information needs to be kept private.

How would you recommend they collaborate?

- A. House all acquisition related channels in a global workspace and make all channels private.
- B. Through a separate hidden workspace.
- C. Use public channels to collaborate on general acquisition issues, and private channels to collaborate on sensitive information.
- D. Through multi-workspace channels.

Answer: D

Explanation:

The best recommendation is to collaborate through multi-workspace channels. The scenario requires long-term collaboration across departments that sit in different workspaces, including finance and legal, while keeping the acquisition private. Multi-workspace channels are designed for this Enterprise Grid pattern because they allow a channel to exist across selected workspaces without forcing every participant into a new workspace or duplicating conversations across separate channels. The channel can be private, tightly scoped, and available only to the required participants from each relevant workspace. Option A creates a separate hidden workspace, but that is heavier than necessary and can isolate work from the departments' existing collaboration context. Option C introduces public channels for acquisition work, which is inappropriate because the acquisition is confidential. Option D puts everything in a global workspace, which risks over-centralizing sensitive work and may not align with the departments' existing workspaces. Multi-workspace channels preserve confidentiality while supporting cross-functional collaboration in place. Reference topic: Grid Design - multi-workspace channels, confidential cross-functional collaboration, private channel design, and Enterprise Grid workspace architecture.
