NEW QUESTION # 47

A team of temporary employees left your organization after completing a shared project. Per company policy, you need to disable their Google Workspace accounts while preserving all project data and related communications in Google Vault for a minimum of two years. You want to comply with this policy while minimizing cost. What should you do?

- A. Purchase and assign Archived User licenses to the former employees.
- B. Move the former employees to their own organizational unit(OU) and disable access to Google services for that OU.
- C. Transfer the former employees' files and data to active user accounts. Delete the former employees' Workspace accounts.
- D. Purchase additional user licenses and suspend the former employees' accounts.

Answer: A

Google Workspace offers Archived User licenses, which allow you to retain access to the data and communications of former employees without paying for a full user license. This option ensures compliance with the policy of retaining project data and communications in Google Vault while minimizing costs by avoiding unnecessary full user licenses.

NEW QUESTION # 48

Several employees from your finance department are collaborating on a long-term, multi-phase project. You need to create a confidential group for this project as quickly as possible. You also want to minimize management overhead. What should you do?

- A. Create a dynamic group and define the Department user attribute as a condition for membership with the value as the finance department.
- B. Create a Google Group by using Google Cloud Directory Sync (GCDS) to automatically sync the members.
- C. Create a Google Group and update the settings to allow anyone in the organization to join the group.
- D. Create a Google Group and appoint a group admin to manage the membership of this group.

Answer: A

Explanation:

A dynamic group automatically updates membership based on user attributes, such as department, ensuring that only relevant employees (e.g., those in the finance department) are added to the group. This minimizes management overhead because the membership is updated automatically, without the need for manual intervention. It also ensures that the group remains up to date as employees join or leave the department.

NEW QUESTION # 50

Your organization is increasingly concerned about its environmental impact. You want to assess the environmental impact of using Google Workspace services. Which report should you use?

- A. Carbon footprint report
- B. Apps Monthly Uptime report
- C. Accounts report
- D. Google Environmental Report

Answer: D

Explanation:

To assess the environmental impact of using Google Workspace services, you should refer to the Google Environmental Report. Google publishes comprehensive reports detailing its environmental efforts, including the energy efficiency of its data centers, its use of renewable energy, and its overall carbon footprint, which includes the impact of services like Google Workspace.

Here's why option B is the correct choice and why the others are not relevant to assessing the overall environmental impact of using Google Workspace:

B . Google Environmental Report

Google regularly publishes detailed environmental reports that cover various aspects of its sustainability initiatives, including its progress towards using renewable energy, its efforts to improve energy efficiency in its operations (which power Google Workspace), and its overall carbon footprint. These reports provide insights into the environmental impact associated with using Google services.

Associate Google Workspace Administrator topics guides or documents reference: While there might not be a specific "Google Workspace Environmental Impact Report" as a standalone document within the Admin console, Google's overarching "Environmental Report" (often found on Google's sustainability or environmental responsibility websites) encompasses the infrastructure and practices that support all Google services, including Google Workspace. Administrators looking for this information would be directed to these publicly available Google reports.

A . Carbon footprint report

While the concept of a "carbon footprint report" is relevant to environmental impact, Google typically includes this information within its broader "Environmental Report" rather than providing a separate report specifically for Google Workspace usage within an organization's Admin console. You would likely find data related to the carbon efficiency of Google's infrastructure in their main environmental disclosures.

Associate Google Workspace Administrator topics guides or documents reference: Google's communication about its carbon footprint and environmental efforts is usually consolidated in their public sustainability reports.

C . Apps Monthly Uptime report

The Apps Monthly Uptime report provides information about the reliability and availability of Google Workspace services. It focuses on service performance and uptime metrics, not on environmental impact or sustainability.

Associate Google Workspace Administrator topics guides or documents reference: The Google Workspace Admin Help documentation on service-level agreements (SLAs) and service status provides information about uptime guarantees and how to monitor service availability, which is the focus of the Apps Monthly Uptime report.

D . Accounts report

The Accounts report in the Google Admin console provides details about user accounts within your organization, such as the number of active users, account status, and other user-related information. It does not contain any data or analysis related to the environmental impact of using Google Workspace services.

Associate Google Workspace Administrator topics guides or documents reference: The Google Workspace Admin Help documentation on reporting and user accounts describes the information available in the Accounts report, which is focused on user management and activity metrics.

Therefore, to assess the environmental impact of using Google Workspace services, your organization should refer to the publicly available Google Environmental Report, which details Google's sustainability efforts and overall environmental performance.
