NEW QUESTION # 21

After a recent unplanned power outage at the site, the power has been restored and you notice power supply fault messages in the event management system (EMS) log or fault lights on the storage shelves.

Which command would you use to collect information about the problem?

- A. storage show fault -v
- B. system node environment sensors show
- C. sysconfig -a
- D. storage show fault

Answer: A

NEW QUESTION # 22

You are asked to replicate 15 of 20 volumes and the network configuration of your storage virtual machine to your other data center.

In this scenario, which NetApp technology should you use?

- A. SnapMirror Synchronous
- B. SVM DR
- C. SVM peering
- D. MetroCluster

Answer: B

Explanation:

SVM disaster recovery is the appropriate NetApp technology because the requirement includes replicating selected volumes and the SVM network configuration to another data center. SnapMirror Synchronous protects individual volumes synchronously but does not replicate the broader SVM configuration as the scenario requires. MetroCluster provides site-level high availability and disaster recovery but is not the selected technology for replicating a subset of volumes plus SVM configuration to another site. SVM peering is only a prerequisite relationship that allows replication; it is not the replication and recovery solution by itself. SVM DR uses SnapMirror to replicate SVM configuration and data so that the destination SVM can be activated during a disaster. Support engineers should recognize phrases such as network configuration, SVM identity, and multiple volumes as indicators of SVM DR rather than single-volume SnapMirror. References

/topics: SVM disaster recovery, SnapMirror SVM replication, network configuration replication, DR activation, and multi-volume data protection.
