Questions (Q153-Q158):

NEW QUESTION # 153

Rick is the IT administrator of a small organization, which has a single central server for all the internal service requests of the employees. Due to the recent increase in the team size, the server has been overburdened leading to delays in the processing of employees' requests. Since cost is an issue, the organization does not want to add more servers and is not willing to go for virtual servers outside the facility.

To solve the problem, Rick interconnected the individual computers of the team members and took the server out of the process. This balanced the load between all the computers bringing down the processing time.

Which architecture did Rick use in this scenario?

- A. Three Tier
- B. Client-Server
- C. N-Tier
- D. Peer-to-Peer

Answer: D

Explanation:

Peer-to-Peer (P2P) architecture connects individual computers to share resources and workloads directly, eliminating reliance on a central server. Rick's solution fits this model by distributing the load across team members' computers.

* Option A (Three Tier): Involves separate layers (e.g., presentation, application, data), not load distribution.

* Option B (Client-Server): Relies on a central server, which Rick removed.

* Option D (N-Tier): A multi-layered architecture, not applicable here.

* "Peer-to-Peer architecture decentralizes processing, leveraging interconnected nodes to balance loads, useful in resource-constrained environments" (Module: Network Architectures, Section: Decentralized Systems).
