NEW QUESTION # 39

A developer is tasked with designing a solution to accommodate multiple client projects within a single Adobe Experience Manager (AEM) instance, each requiring its own set of unique resources, code, and content.

Given the need for true multi-tenancy, where each tenant operates independently with zero knowledge of other tenants and no shared code, content, or common authors, which approach should the developer recommend?

- A. Encourage the use of component groups and allowedPaths properties to logically separate tenant-specific components and templates within the same AEM instance.
- B. Implement separate author and publish instances for each tenant, ensuring complete isolation of resources, code, and content, thereby achieving true multi-tenancy.
- C. Utilize AEM's out-of-the-box multi-tenancy capabilities to segregate tenants within the same author and publish instances, relying on access control lists (ACLs) and content path organization to ensure separation.

Answer: B
