IBM MQ v9.4 Administrator - Professional Sample Questions (Q24-Q29):

NEW QUESTION # 24

In IBM MQ, administrators often configure multiple queue managers to work together for high availability. Which explanation correctly details how multi-instance queue managers function, how they provide failover, and what differences exist compared to clustering?

- A. Multi-instance queue managers operate independently without sharing state, and clustering automatically merges queues into a single logical queue.
- B. Multi-instance queue managers maintain a primary and standby instance sharing the same storage, automatically failing over if the primary fails, whereas clustering connects multiple independent queue managers to enable load balancing and routing.
- C. Multi-instance queue managers replicate all messages in real-time to every other queue manager, while clusters only monitor message flow.
- D. Multi-instance queue managers require manual intervention to switch to the standby instance, while clustering provides automatic failover.

Answer: B

Explanation:

Multi-instance queue managers provide high availability by maintaining a standby instance that takes over automatically if the primary fails, while clustering offers routing, load balancing, and high availability across multiple independent queue managers.

NEW QUESTION # 25

In IBM MQ, if a message cannot be delivered to its target queue due to a misconfiguration or unavailability, which MQ component captures the undelivered message and provides a mechanism for administrators to inspect and resolve the issue?

- A. Dead-letter queue (DLQ)
- B. Alias queue
- C. Temporary queue
- D. Backout queue

Answer: A

Explanation:

The Dead-letter queue captures undelivered messages, allowing administrators to inspect, analyze, and re-route or correct delivery issues safely.

NEW QUESTION # 26

IBM MQ provides triggers that allow applications or processes to be started automatically when specific queue conditions are met. Which of the following scenarios best illustrates the use of MQ triggering?

- A. Creating dynamic queues for each application request automatically
- B. Automatically launching a consumer program when a message arrives in an application queue
- C. Redirecting all incoming messages to a Dead Letter Queue for analysis
- D. Encrypting messages at rest inside the file system by default

Answer: B

Explanation:

Triggers are used to start applications when certain queue conditions occur, such as a message arriving in an empty queue, enabling automation and event-driven processing.

NEW QUESTION # 27

Which explanation best describes the role and configuration of IBM MQ message selectors in complex messaging scenarios, including how selectors filter messages based on header properties or custom application-defined attributes to allow subscribers or applications to receive only the relevant subset of messages?

- A. Message selectors automatically route all messages to every subscriber
- B. Message selectors evaluate message properties using expressions to filter messages, allowing subscribers to consume only messages that match specified criteria
- C. Message selectors are only used for logging purposes and do not filter messages
- D. Message selectors require changes to the message body to function

Answer: B

Explanation:

Message selectors use properties in MQ message headers to filter messages. Subscribers receive only messages that match the selector criteria, improving efficiency and reducing unnecessary message processing.

NEW QUESTION # 28

When developing applications that interact with IBM MQ using JMS, which configuration ensures that messages are transactionally consistent, allows rollback in case of processing errors, and supports integration with other transactional resources such as databases?

- A. Configuring JMS sessions with transacted mode and XA transactions coordinated by the queue manager
- B. Using non-persistent messages with application-level retry logic only
- C. Sending messages asynchronously without transactions and handling errors manually
- D. Writing messages directly to queues using synchronous put without transaction support

Answer: A

Explanation:

JMS transacted sessions with XA transactions allow rollback, ensure transactional consistency, and coordinate messaging with other transactional resources like databases.
