Reference:<https://community.splunk.com/t5/Getting-Data-In/Why-does-Splunk-have-multiple-indexes/m-p/12063>

Different retention times: You can set different retention policies for different indexes, depending on how long you want to keep the data. For example, you can have an index for security data that has a longer retention time than an index for performance data that has a shorter retention time.

Restrict user permissions: You can set different access permissions for different indexes, depending on who needs to see the data. For example, you can have an index for sensitive data that is only accessible by certain users or roles, and an index for public data that is accessible by everyone.

NEW QUESTION # 173

Which data pipeline phase is the last opportunity for defining event boundaries?

- A. Input phase
- B. Search phase
- C. Indexing phase
- D. Parsing phase

Answer: D

Explanation:

The parsing phase is the process of extracting fields and values from raw data. The parsing phase respects `LINE_BREAKER`, `SHOULD_LINEMERGE`, `BREAK_ONLY_BEFORE_DATE`, and all other line merging settings in `props.conf`. These settings determine how Splunk breaks the data into events based on certain criteria, such as timestamps or regular expressions. The event boundaries are defined by the `props.conf` file, which can be modified by the administrator.

Therefore, the parsing phase is the last opportunity for defining event boundaries.

```

- A. host=server1
index=searchinfo
- B. host=server1
index=unixinfo
- C. host=unixsvr1
index=unixinfo
- D. host=searchsvr1
index=searchinfo

Answer: B
