NEW QUESTION # 29

An organization is undergoing a digital transformation and is conducting a strategic analysis of its customers' needs. The organization uses agile methods to manage its digital products and a more traditional waterfall approach to manage its legacy systems. The organization is also considering introducing new products and services. Which is the BEST way for this organization to undertake this analysis?

Answer:

Explanation:

Develop models that help analysts perform tasks that are appropriate for a given context

NEW QUESTION # 30

An organization says it wants to become "high velocity," so it instructs all teams to release changes faster. As a result, failed changes increase, employees feel pressured, and customers complain about instability.

What is the BEST conclusion?

- A. The organization should separate development and operations teams completely
- B. The organization should stop using automation tools
- C. The organization should continue, because velocity always increases value
- D. The organization has focused on speed without balancing other HVIT objectives

Answer: D

Explanation:

HVIT is not simply about making teams move faster. It is about achieving the right balance across objectives such as fast development, resilient operations, co-created value, valuable investments, and assured conformance. In this scenario, the organization focused narrowly on speed and ignored reliability, people impacts, and customer outcomes.

A is wrong because speed alone does not guarantee value. C is not supported by the scenario. D usually moves away from collaboration and flow rather than improving them. The most accurate conclusion is that the organization failed to balance velocity with the other essential dimensions of HVIT.

Therefore B is the best answer.
