ISC Certified Information Systems Security Professional (CISSP) Sample Questions (Q133-Q138):

NEW QUESTION # 133

The PRIMARY purpose of a security awareness program is to

- A. warn all users that access to all systems will be monitored on a daily basis.
- B. ensure that everyone understands the organization's policies and procedures.
- C. communicate that access to information will be granted on a need-to-know basis.
- D. comply with regulations related to data and information protection.

Answer: B

Explanation:

The primary purpose of a security awareness program is to ensure that everyone understands the organization's policies and procedures related to information security. A security awareness program is a set of activities, materials, or events that aim to educate and inform the employees, contractors, partners, and customers of the organization about the security goals, principles, and practices of the organization. A security awareness program can help to create a security culture, improve the security behavior, and reduce the human errors or risks. Communicating that access to information will be granted on a need-to-know basis, warning all users that access to all systems will be monitored on a daily basis, and complying with regulations related to data and information protection are not the primary purposes of a security awareness program, as they are more specific or secondary objectives that may be part of the program, but not the main goal.

NEW QUESTION # 134

According to the Orange Book, which security level is the first to require a system to protect against covert timing channels?

- A. B1
- B. B2
- C. B3
- D. A1

Answer: C

Explanation:

B1 does not address covert channels. B2 requires a system to protect against covert storage channels but does not address covert timing channels. B3 and A1 both address covert storage channels and covert timing channels and must perform a covert channel analysis for both types. NEW QUESTION # 135

Which of the following is the MOST significant benefit to implementing a third-party federated identity architecture?

- A. Enable business objectives so departments can focus on mission rather than the business of identity management
- B. Reduction in operational costs to the agency
- C. Data decrease related to storing personal information
- D. Attribute assertions as agencies can request a larger set of attributes to fulfill service delivery

Answer: A

Explanation:

A third-party federated identity architecture is a system that allows users to access multiple services or applications across different domains or organizations using a single identity. The most significant benefit of implementing such an architecture is that it enables business objectives so departments can focus on their mission rather than the business of identity management. By delegating the authentication and authorization processes to a trusted third party, the departments can reduce the complexity, cost, and risk of managing their own identity systems, and improve the user experience and satisfaction. NEW QUESTION # 136

How is polyinstantiation used to secure a multilevel database?

- A. Two operations at the same layer will conflict if they operate on the same data item and at least one of them is an update.
- B. It ensures that all mechanism in a system are responsible for enforcing the database security policy.
- C. It confirms that all constrained data items within the system conform to integrity specifications.
- D. It prevents low-level database users from inferring the existence of higher level data.

Answer: D

Explanation:

"Polyinstantiation is the development of a detailed version of an object from another object using different values in the new object. In the database information security, this term is concerned with the same primary key for different relations at different classification levels being stored in the same database. For example, in a relational database, the same of a military unit may be classified Secret in the database and may have an identification number as the primary key. If another user at a lower classification level attempts to create a confidential entry for another military unit using the same identification number as a primary key, a rejection of this attempt would imply to the lower level user that the same identification number existed at a higher level of classification. To avoid this inference channel of information, the lower level user would be issued the same identification number for their unit and the database management system would manage this situation where the same primary key was used for different units." Pg 352-353 Krutz: The CISSP Prep Guide: Gold Edition.

"Polyinstantiation occurs when two or more rows in the same table appear to have identical primary key elements but contain different data for use at differing classification levels. Polyinstantiation is often used as a defense against some types of inference attacks.

For example, consider a database table containing the location of various naval ships on patrol.

Normally, this database contains the exact position of each ship stored at the level with secret classification. However, on particular ship, the USS UpToNoGood, is on an undercover mission to a top-secret location. Military commanders do not want anyone to know that the ship deviated from its normal patrol. If the database administrators simply change the classification of the UpToNoGood's location to top secret, a user with secret clearance would know that something unusual was going on when they couldn't query the location of the ship. However, if polyinstantiation is used, two records could be inserted into the table. The first one, classified at the top secret level, would reflect the true location of the ship and be available only to users with the appropriate top secret security clearance. The second record, classified at the secret level, would indicate that the ship was on routine patrol and would be returned to users with a secret clearance."
