Explanation:

Compartmentalization is the best defense-in-depth implementation for protecting high value assets or for handling environments that have trust concerns because it is a strategy that divides the network or system into smaller segments or compartments, each with its own security policies, controls, and access rules.

Compartmentalization helps to isolate and protect the most sensitive or critical data and functions from unauthorized or malicious access, as well as to limit the damage or impact of a breach or compromise.

Compartmentalization also helps to enforce the principle of least privilege, which grants users or processes only the minimum access rights they need to perform their tasks. Therefore, compartmentalization is the correct answer.

Explanation:

Explanation

Positioning security as a business enabler is the BEST way to obtain organization-wide support for an information security program, because it helps to demonstrate the value and benefits of security to the organization's strategic objectives, performance, and reputation. By aligning security with the business goals and needs, the information security manager can gain the buy-in and commitment of senior management and other stakeholders, and foster a positive security culture across the organization.
