NEW QUESTION # 26

What are typical topics for a change assessment at the beginning of an SAP cloud implementation? Note: There are 3 correct answers to this question.

- A. The company's change management capabilities
- B. The assessment of the key stakeholders' attitude towards the project
- C. The scope for change management
- D. The cloud project's vision and expected benefits
- E. The change culture of the company

Answer: A,B,E

Explanation:

A change assessment at the start of an SAP cloud project (typically in the Prepare phase) evaluates the organization's readiness for change. Option A is correct because understanding the company's change culture (e.g., openness to innovation) sets the tone for the approach. Option D is correct as it assesses the organization's existing change management capabilities (e.g., skills, tools), identifying gaps to address.

Option E is correct because gauging stakeholders' attitudes (e.g., support or resistance) is critical for planning engagement strategies. Option B is incorrect-defining the scope of change management is an outcome of the assessment, not a topic itself. Option C is also incorrect; the project vision and benefits are defined by project leadership, not assessed as part of the change assessment. Extract from SAP OCM Concepts: The change assessment in SAP Activate's Prepare phase focuses on readiness factors like culture, capabilities, and stakeholder perspectives (SAP OCM Framework).

NEW QUESTION # 27

Which follow-up activities derived from a detailed change impact analysis are usually taken over by change management?

- A. Develop personas for the communication of the change impact and create communication assets
- B. Identify resource constraints within impacted business units and develop mitigation activities
- C. Design the future operating model for impacted business units and plan the implementation
- D. Define new roles and responsibilities and adapt organizational policies and procedures

Answer: A

Explanation:

A detailed change impact analysis (CIA), conducted in the SAP Activate Explore or Realize phase, identifies specific changes across processes, technology, organization, and people, leading to follow-up activities.

Option C is correct because change management typically takes over developing personas (e.g., "Finance Clerk Sarah") to tailor communication about impacts (e.g., how new processes affect her day) and creating assets (e.g., newsletters, videos) to convey these messages effectively. This aligns with SAP OCM's focus on translating CIA findings into stakeholder engagement strategies. For instance, if the CIA shows a process change in accounts payable, change management might craft a persona-based FAQ to address user concerns, ensuring adoption through relatable messaging.

Option A is incorrect-defining roles/responsibilities and adapting policies (e.g., job descriptions, compliance rules) is typically an HR or organizational design task, often led by business leaders or project management, not change management, which focuses on people readiness, not structural redesign. Option B is incorrect; identifying resource constraints (e.g., staff shortages) and mitigation (e.g., hiring plans) falls under project management or business unit leadership, as it's operational rather than OCM-specific. Option D is incorrect- designing the future operating model (e.g., org charts, workflows) and planning its rollout is a strategic task for business architects or consultants, not change management, which supports rather than owns this process.

SAP OCM positions change management as the driver of communication and enablement post-CIA, not structural or resource adjustments.

"Change management takes on follow-up activities from a detailed CIA, such as developing personas and communication assets, to ensure stakeholders understand and adopt identified changes" (SAP Activate Methodology, OCM Workstream, Post-CIA Responsibilities).
