A new agile team member notices that the team's current process involves excessive documentation. What should the new team member do?

- A. Allow another team member to prepare those documents that do not appear to bring value.
- B. Teach the team the appropriate agile principle, obtain consensus, and drive adoption.
- C. Notify the project manager about other documentation techniques, and identify which documents bring value and which do not.
- D. Follow the existing process to avoid conflicts.

Answer: B

Explanation:
The correct answer is A - Teach the team the appropriate agile principle, obtain consensus, and drive adoption.
Agile values "working software over comprehensive documentation." However, this does not mean eliminating all documentation, but rather focusing on documentation that delivers value.
PMI Agile Practice Guide states:
"Agile teams should regularly question whether the work being done adds value, including documentation. If documentation does not serve a current need or stakeholder, it should be minimized or eliminated." (PMI Agile Practice Guide, Section 2.2 - Agile Manifesto) Mike Griffiths further supports this in his exam prep book:

"Agile team members are encouraged to surface inefficiencies and suggest improvements. This is an example of continuous improvement and shared responsibility." Option A aligns with both the Agile Manifesto and the principle of team empowerment. Options B, C, and D either avoid accountability or introduce hierarchy that agile teams seek to minimize.
