NEW QUESTION # 114

You are receiving multiple BGP routes from an upstream neighbor and only want to advertise a single summarized prefix to your internal OSPF neighbors. This route should only be advertised when you are receiving these BGP routes from this neighbor. In this scenario, which type of route should you create?

- A. generate route
- B. aggregate route
- C. static route using the resolve feature
- D. static route using qualified next hops

Answer: A

Both aggregate and generated routes would work, but the best choice is generated routes.

One key difference:

With aggregated routes any prefix in the routing table counts as a contributing route.

With generated routes only prefix with a valid next-hop qualifies.

- A. MAC limiting is enabled on the interface.
- B. Dynamic ARP inspection is enabled on the interface.
- C. The device that is connected to the interface has a static IP address.
- D. The device that is connected to the interface has performed a DHCPRELEASE.

Answer: C,D

Explanation:

If the device connected to the interface has performed a DHCPRELEASE, it releases its IP address back to the DHCP server, resulting in the removal of the corresponding DHCP snooping entry.

If the device connected to the interface is using a static IP address, it will not send DHCP requests, and therefore no entries will be created in the DHCP snooping database for that device.
