APEGS National Professional Practice Examination (NPPE) Exam Sample Questions (Q128-Q133):

NEW QUESTION # 128

When designing and manufacturing products, businesses and licensed professionals must demonstrate a standard of care to ensure the safety of their consumers and/or clients. Which of the following tasks or procedures relating to product design and manufacturing is not part of a business's or professional's responsibility in this regard?

- A. Eliminate liability through carefully crafted legal caveats
- B. Ensure that product design and manufacture meet expectations for safe usage by the end-user
- C. Follow existing design codes, standards, and leading practices
- D. Carry out hazard analysis and risk assessment

Answer: A

Explanation:

The standard of care in product design/manufacturing involves designing for safe use, identifying hazards, assessing risks, applying appropriate standards, and implementing controls, testing, and warnings. Options A, B, and D are core responsibilities: ensuring safe design and manufacture (A), applying relevant codes /standards and good practice (B), and performing hazard analysis and risk assessment (D). Option C is not a valid safety responsibility: businesses and professionals cannot "eliminate" liability simply by legal caveats or disclaimers, especially where negligence, unsafe products, or statutory duties are involved. NPPE liability themes emphasize that disclaimers may be limited, may not protect against negligence causing harm, and do not replace the obligation to meet the standard of care. Therefore, C is the task that is not part of responsible design/manufacturing practice.

NEW QUESTION # 129

If a major technical project falls because of software errors, a Question that Is likely to be asked Is. "What tests were performed to ensure accuracy of the software?"

Which of the following procedures is not a good software validation test?

- A. Dummy test runs to check the program's computation using nominal entries such as zeroes or ones to get a known answer.
- B. Estimate possible outcomes using rough calculations and guess work, since full-scale validation can be expensive for a technical project.
- C. Apply analytical calculations to a simpler model to find an approximate answer, and then compare It with the software output result.
- D. A full-scale duplication of the computation and associated results using similar but different software, hardware, and Input files.

Answer: B

Explanation:

In software validation, the procedure that is not a good test is estimating possible outcomes using rough calculations and guesswork (Option D). Proper software validation involves thorough, systematic testing that provides reliable, reproducible results, not estimations based on guesswork. This approach lacks the precision and reliability required in software testing, which seeks to verify that the software performs as expected under various conditions through structured testing methods like dummy test runs, full-scale duplications, and analytical calculations.

NEW QUESTION # 130

A licensed professional Is a mediator at a firm specializing in resolving contractual disputes between Businesses. Recently, the professional was assigned to be Die mediator In a business contract dispute Involving their father-In-law's company. What is the most reasonable course of action for the professional to take?

- A. Immediately announce their relationship and continue with the process, ensuring an unbiased approach.
- B. Immediately announce their relationship and remove themselves from the assignment.
- C. Continue on with the assignment, ensuring they maintain an unbiased approach.
- D. Resign from the assignment citing personal and confidential reasons.

Answer: B

Explanation:

The most reasonable course of action for the professional, when assigned as a mediator in a dispute involving a family member's company, is to immediately announce their relationship and remove themselves from the assignment (Option C). This decision upholds the professional's duty to avoid conflicts of interest and ensures the mediation process remains impartial and credible.

NEW QUESTION # 131

Which of the following rights is not one of the fundamental rights of workers defined by Canadian OH&S legislation?

- A. The right to sue the employer for workplace injuries
- B. The right to be informed of known health hazards in the workplace
- C. The right to refuse dangerous work
- D. The right to participate in the prevention of occupational accidents

Answer: A

Explanation:

Canadian occupational health and safety systems commonly identify three fundamental worker rights: the right to know about hazards (information, instruction, training) (D), the right to participate in workplace health and safety (e.g., through reporting, representatives, and committees) (C), and the right to refuse unsafe work in defined circumstances without reprisal (A). The right to sue an employer for workplace injuries is generally not a fundamental OHS right and is often limited by workers' compensation regimes, which typically provide no-fault benefits in exchange for restricting lawsuits against employers for most workplace injuries. While legal avenues may exist in exceptional circumstances (e.g., third-party liability), suing the employer is not part of the core OH&S rights framework emphasized in NPPE materials. Therefore, B is the right that is not considered one of the fundamental OH&S rights.

NEW QUESTION # 132

Accepting personal responsibility for the quality of the work performed by a member of an occupation is often considered to be an indication of

- A. a commitment to a code of ethics.
- B. professionalism
- C. government regulatory authority.
- D. quality control

Answer: B

Explanation:

Accepting personal responsibility for the quality of work performed is fundamentally an attribute of professionalism (Option A). Professionalism entails adhering to the standards, responsibilities, and ethical codes of a profession. It emphasizes the importance of personal accountability in maintaining the integrity and quality of work, reflecting a commitment to ethical practice and excellence in one's field.
