- B. None of these
- C. Consumer, provider, carrier, auditor, and broker

NEW QUESTION # 269

Attackers or insiders create a backdoor into a trusted network by installing an unsecured access point inside a firewall. They then use any software or hardware access point to perform an attack. Which of the following is this type of attack?

- A. Rogue- access point attack
- B. Email infection
- C. Malware attack
- D. Password-based attack

Answer: A

Explanation:

A rogue-access point attack occurs when attackers or insiders install an unsecured access point within a trusted network, typically behind a firewall, to create a backdoor. This allows them to bypass network security measures and perform various malicious activities undetected. The use of any software or hardware access point to gain unauthorized access and conduct an attack characterizes a rogue-access point attack. This contrasts with password-based attacks, malware attacks, and email infections, which involve different methodologies and objectives, such as stealing credentials, distributing malicious software, or propagating through email systems, respectively.

References: The ECIH v3 certification materials discuss various types of network attacks, including rogue- access point attacks, highlighting the risk they pose by providing unauthorized network access to attackers.

NEW QUESTION # 272

Which of the following types of digital evidence is temporarily stored in a digital device that requires constant power supply and is deleted if the power supply is interrupted?

- A. Process memory
- B. Swap file
- C. Slack space
- D. Event logs

Answer: A

Explanation:

Process memory (RAM) is a type of digital evidence that is temporarily stored and requires a constant power supply to retain information. If the power supply is interrupted, the information stored in process memory is lost. This type of evidence can include data about running programs, user actions, system events, and more, making it crucial for forensic analysis, especially in identifying actions taken by both users and malware.

Collecting data from process memory helps incident responders understand the state of the system at the time of an incident and can reveal valuable information that is not persisted elsewhere on the device.

References: Incident handling and response training, such as the ECIH v3 program, emphasize the importance of collecting and analyzing volatile data, including process memory, to effectively investigate and respond to cybersecurity incidents.
