ISC Certified Information Systems Security Professional (CISSP) Sample Questions (Q1285-Q1290):

NEW QUESTION # 1285

According to NIST, which choice below is not an accepted security selftesting technique?

- A. War Dialing
- B. Virus Distribution
- C. Virus Detection
- D. Password Cracking

Answer: B

Explanation:

Common types of self-testing techniques include:

Network Mapping
Vulnerability Scanning
Penetration Testing
Password Cracking
Log Review
Virus Detection
War Dialing

Some testing techniques are predominantly human-initiated and conducted, while other tests are highly automated and require less human involvement. The staff that initiates and implements in-house security testing should have significant security and networking knowledge. These testing techniques are often combined to gain a more comprehensive assessment of the overall network security posture.

For example, penetration testing almost always includes network mapping and vulnerability scanning to identify vulnerable hosts and services that may be targeted for later penetration. None of these tests by themselves will provide a complete picture of the network or its security posture. Source: NIST Special Publication 800-42, DRAFT Guideline on Network Security Testing.

- B. A system audit cannot be automated.

- C. A system audit is an ongoing real-time activity that examines a system.
- D. Monitoring is an ongoing activity that examines either the system or the users.

Answer: D

Explanation:

System audits and monitoring are the two methods organizations use to maintain operational assurance. Although the terms are used loosely within the computer security community, a system audit is a one-time or periodic event to evaluate security, whereas monitoring refers to an ongoing activity that examines either the system or the users. In general, the more real-time an activity is, the more it falls into the category of monitoring.
