IBM MQ v9.4 Administrator - Professional Sample Questions (Q66-Q71):

NEW QUESTION # 66

In IBM MQ, which feature allows a message to be sent to a queue without waiting for the receiving application to process it, ensuring asynchronous communication between distributed systems?

- A. Publish/Subscribe messaging allows messages to be sent to multiple subscribers asynchronously.
- B. Request/Reply messaging requires the sender to wait for a response from the receiver.
- C. Persistent messaging ensures messages are stored reliably until delivered.
- D. Point-to-point messaging enables direct communication between a single sender and a single receiver.

Answer: A

Explanation:

Publish/Subscribe messaging enables asynchronous distribution of messages to multiple subscribers without waiting for a response, supporting decoupled communication.

NEW QUESTION # 67

In an IBM MQ setup supporting a logistics company, there is a need to group related messages such as shipment status updates so that they are consumed together in the correct sequence by the same application instance, rather than being distributed across different consumers. Which MQ feature should be applied?

- A. Using publish/subscribe model with multiple non-durable subscribers
- B. Implementing dead-letter queues to capture related messages
- C. Configuring multiple separate queues for each shipment update
- D. Using message grouping with logical message group IDs

Answer: D

Explanation:

Message grouping ensures that related messages are logically grouped and delivered in sequence to the same consumer, which is critical for correlated transaction flows.

NEW QUESTION # 68

In IBM MQ, when designing a system for global enterprise applications that require reliable communication across multiple regions, which feature allows messages to be routed automatically to available queue managers in a cluster while ensuring load balancing and minimal configuration changes at the sending application side?

- A. Multi-instance queue managers that provide failover but do not handle routing across regions.
- B. MQ Clustering which dynamically routes messages to any available queue manager in the cluster, supporting load balancing and high availability.
- C. Queue Grouping that distributes messages among consumers within the same queue but does not route across multiple queue managers.
- D. Dead Letter Queues that capture undelivered messages but do not provide routing capabilities.

Answer: B

Explanation:

MQ Clustering enables dynamic routing and load balancing across multiple queue managers, allowing enterprise applications to communicate efficiently without manual configuration of target queues.

NEW QUESTION # 69

In a scenario where a message producer sends a critical financial transaction message to a queue, which IBM MQ feature guarantees that the message will be delivered exactly once to the consumer, even if the consumer application fails or a network error occurs?

- A. Persistent messages with MQ GET in syncpoint mode
- B. Using message groups without persistence

- C. Non-persistent messages with multiple consumers
- D. MQ Explorer monitoring with alerts

Answer: A

Explanation:

Using persistent messages with syncpoint (transactional) GET ensures that each message is processed exactly once and is not lost during network or application failures.

NEW QUESTION # 70

In an IBM MQ system used by an e-commerce company, some applications produce messages much faster than consumers can process them, causing queues to fill up quickly and impacting system performance. Which MQ features can help prevent message buildup while still ensuring important orders are prioritized?

- A. Manually deleting old messages when the queue is full
- B. Implementing message priority, defining backout queues, and configuring flow control mechanisms
- C. Relying on non-persistent messaging to avoid storage overhead
- D. Increasing the maximum queue depth and ignoring backlogs

Answer: B

Explanation:

Message priority, backout queues, and flow control allow critical orders to be prioritized and processed first, while preventing queues from overflowing due to slower consumers.
