NEW QUESTION # 104

You are a new Test Manager on a maintenance release for an existing mature product that is expected to be retired in the not too distant future. The previous release had utilized a performance regression test suite written in an in-house custom tool using the same programming language as the product itself. This suite will most likely require tweaking to ensure it works with the new version of the product. While there are several members in the performance testing team, the original author of the performance testing tool has moved on to another company, and none of the remaining staff have a great deal of familiarity with the performance test scripts used to test this product.

How would you recommend this scenario be addressed? [3]

- A. Reduce the scope of the product testing to exclude performance testing.
- B. Make the in-house tool available to the open source community.
- C. Leverage the development team to fill any knowledge gaps in the in-house tool.
- D. Retire the in-house tool and switch to a vendor supported tool for performance testing.

Answer: C

Explanation:

The best option to address this scenario is to leverage the development team to fill any knowledge gaps in the in-house tool. This option allows the test team to reuse the existing performance test suite and avoid the risks and costs of switching to a new tool or excluding performance testing altogether. The development team can provide support and guidance to the test team on how to use and modify the in-house tool, since it is written in the same programming language as the product itself. This option also preserves the intellectual property of the organization and does not expose the in-house tool to the open source community.
