NEW QUESTION # 43

Your quality department detects a deviation in a raw material batch. Unfortunately, this batch has already been used in production.

How can you identify all affected finished goods stocks?

Note: There are 2 correct answers to this question.

- A. Use the batch where-used list.
- B. Use batch derivation.
- C. Use the Batch Information Cockpit.
- D. Use batch determination

Answer: A,C

Explanation:

To identify all affected finished goods stocks that contain a deviated raw material batch, you can use the following tools:

The Batch Information Cockpit (BIC) is a central tool that provides an overview of all relevant information and documents related to a batch. You can use the BIC to display the batch genealogy, which shows the hierarchical relationships between batches along the production and distribution process. You can also use the BIC to display the batch traceability, which shows the chronological sequence of events and transactions that affect a batch. The BIC allows you to analyze the batch history and the batch usage across different plants and systems.

The batch where-used list is a tool that determines how a batch is created and used in Production Planning (PP) through various stages of production and displays the result in a list. You can use the batch where-used list to find out in which other batches a batch was used and from which other batches a batch was created. This is important in the case of complaints and questions about product safety if the composition of semi-finished and finished products has to be documented across all production levels. Batch derivation and batch determination are not tools to identify affected finished goods stocks, but rather tools to assign batches to production orders or sales orders based on certain criteria. Batch derivation is a process of transferring characteristics or values from one batch to another, while batch determination is a process of finding suitable batches for a requirement based on predefined conditions.
