NEW QUESTION # 189

An agile practitioner is working on a project to migrate data from computer systems to another location. To accomplish this task, they need to run four activities sequentially that different teams are performing. The teams are migrating two systems per day, but the agile practitioner thinks that three systems should be done per day. What can be done to improve process efficiency?

- A. Use value stream mapping to find gaps, delays, and constraints in the current process and develop a plan to reduce or remove them.
- B. Use Pareto analysis to find gaps, delays, and constraints in the current process and develop a plan to reduce or remove them.
- C. Use root cause analysis to find gaps, delays, and constraints in the current process and develop a plan to reduce or remove them.

- D. Use burndown charts to find gaps, delays, and constraints in the current process and develop a plan to reduce or remove them

Answer: A

Explanation:

Value stream mapping is a powerful tool in Agile and Lean methodologies used to visualize and analyze the flow of materials and information across the entire process. By mapping the current state, the team can identify bottlenecks, delays, and inefficiencies, especially when multiple teams are involved in sequential activities. Once these gaps and constraints are identified, the team can work on improving the process, such as by finding ways to increase the number of systems migrated per day from two to three, thus improving overall efficiency.
