NEW QUESTION # 27

An administrator wants to automatically prevent volumes that are used in a SnapMirror relationship from running out of space. Which of the following volume snapshot autodelete modify parameters would ensure that this goal can be accomplished?

- A. -defer-delete user_created
- B. -commitment try
- C. -defer-delete scheduled
- D. -commitment disrupt

Answer: B

Explanation:

Setting -commitment try on the volume snapshot autodelete modify command allows ONTAP to automatically delete eligible Snapshot copies when a volume is running low on space, but only if it can do so without violating SnapMirror or retention policies. This ensures volumes in SnapMirror relationships stay healthy and do not run out of space unexpectedly.

NEW QUESTION # 28

You are tasked with planning a backup solution for a VMware environment running Windows VM. There is a requirement that production datastores must have ten days of local backups and a daily replication to a DR cluster site. The development datastores require only 7 days of local backups. There is also a requirement for a tool for the VMware administrators that enables them to monitor backups and perform restores.

What procedure can you use to meet the requirements?

- A. In NetApp ONTAP System Manager, create Snapshot policies for production and development datastore volumes, and create a protection relationship for each production volume.
- B. Install the NetApp SnapCenter Server from the GUI, create policies for production and development, and create resource groups for the production and development datastores.
- C. Deploy the NetApp SnapCenter Plug-In for Microsoft Windows from vCenter, create policies for production and development, and create resource groups for the production and development datastores.
- D. Deploy the NetApp SnapCenter Plug-In for VMware vSphere from vCenter, create policies for production and development, and create resource groups for the production and development datastores.

Answer: D

Explanation:

To meet the requirements of:
